Many footnotes

The first claim needs a source.[1] So does the second one, which is longer and wraps onto another line of the page before its note is referenced.[2]

A second paragraph brings two more notes,[3] one of them with emphasis inside.[4] The notes are numbered in order through the whole document.

A last paragraph has a final note at its end.[5]

[1] Knuth and Plass, Breaking Paragraphs into Lines, 1981.

[2] A footnote can be long enough to need two lines of its own at the foot of the page, set in footnote size with its own leading.

[3] Short.

[4] A note with emphasis in italics.

[5] The last note.