Long words

Some words are long enough to need two or three hyphens on their own: internationalization, characteristically, incomprehensibilities, electroencephalographic, counterrevolutionaries and institutionalization all have to break somewhere when the measure is only 345 points wide.

Technical prose adds compounds of its own, such as microprocessor-based instrumentation, telecommunications infrastructure, photolithographically patterned semiconductors and the electrophysiological characterization of cardiomyocytes, which TeX's patterns break at the places a dictionary would choose.
