Footnotes

Footnotes are set in footnote size at the foot of the page that refers to them, below a short rule.[1] A page may carry several notes, and they take their room from the text above.[2]

The text then continues as usual, with a paragraph long enough to fill a few lines and to show that the footnotes do not disturb the baseline grid of the body.

[1] The rule is 0.4 pt thick and two fifths of the text width long.

[2] TeX's page builder subtracts the height of every inserted note from the goal for the page.